$14.5 Million Already Expended on Legislative General Election with Battleground Districts Getting Lion's Share

With the legislative general election moving into full swing, candidates and independent committees already have spent $14.5 million, with more than two thirds being sunk into five key districts, according to reports filed with the New Jersey Election Law Enforcement Commission (ELEC).

Based on the latest available reports, candidates have raised $31.8 million, spent $12.3 million and reported $19.5 million cash in reserve. Independent spending committees so far have disclosed spending $2.3 million. Combining that total with candidate spending, the general election already has cost $14.5 million.

More than two thirds of that spending has occurred so far in five legislative districts that are among the most competitive in the state. There are 40 legislative districts in New Jersey.

The top five districts already have drawn 58 percent of candidate spending, 94 percent of independent committee spending and 64 percent of combined spending.

“So-called battleground, or swing, districts typically become the focal point for most spending during legislative elections,” said Jeff Brindle, ELEC’s Executive Director. “Most incumbents face little real risk of losing because redistricting protects their seats. So they can send money to the more competitive districts.”

“Independent groups both nationally and in New Jersey have tended to concentrate their firepower on target districts,” he added.

Brindle said independent special interest committees already have spent more than the primary and now have expended $4.5 million to date.

“They have a long way to go, however, to surpass the record $27.3 million spent on the 2017 legislative election,” he added.
